NO: “[I]f we confine our observation to the power of the consuls, we should be inclined to regard it as despotic; if that of the Senate, as aristocratic; and if finally one looks at the power possessed by the people, it would seem a clear case of a democracy.”
—Mellor 37.

YES: “[I]f we confine our observation to the power of the consuls, we should be inclined to regard it as despotic; if that of the Senate, as aristocratic; and if finally one looks at the power possessed by the people, it would seem a clear case of a democracy.”
—Pol. 6.11 (Polybius 6.11).

“Christian belief demanded absence from polytheistic state rituals. There was a fundamental difference between Christian and polytheistic religious sensibilities. The Christian’s religious affiliation provided them, individually and collectively, with an identity distinct from that of city, tribe, or family. By contrast, for polytheistic Romans, religious rituals and practices were integral to all civic and familial activities, and religious roles overlapped with political ones.”
